Archbishop Palmer Buckle, Vice President and Metropolitan Archbishop of Accra.

President Mahama said as a Christian, he believed in all the tenets of the Bible, which partly stated that “the voice of the People is the voice of God” and would therefore continue to play his role towards the growth and development of the country.

He said the intercessory prayers of the religious bodies in Ghana could not be taken for granted and called on the Catholic Bishops to offer the same support they offered him to the incoming government to ensure the perpetual growth of the country.

Ghana, he added, would continue to be respected by her peers and the international world for her respect for democracy and constitutional rule and called on Ghanaians to unite for their common development goals.

Archbishop Naameh, President of the Conference, said Ghana would forever remember President Mahama for his numerous infrastructural developments dotted throughout the country.

He pledged the prayer of the conference for him even in his life after the Presidency and urged him to continue to offer any other suggestions that could move the country forward.

“We the Catholic Bishops conference will like to commend you for your demonstration of statesmanship, which has seen Ghana’s general election through peacefully,” he said.
